The future promise of technological innovation

The promise of new technologies lies in their ability to transform the present and shape the future in a way that improves how we live and work. The companies developing these technologies will reap rewards as they create the new products and services we need.

Over the last two decades, we saw the rise of the personal computer, the Internet, social media and ecommerce. In this decade, we have seen the evolution of cloud computing, blockchain, augmented reality and the Internet of Things (IoT) which allow devices to interact with software to control heating and cooling in our homes, Machine to Machine (M2M) direct communications, as well as new age pharmaceuticals and "swallowable" capsules that can detect and heal without invasive surgery -- and it's just the beginning.

Technology is everywhere; creating new businesses

The tech race continues to heat up with technological innovations that are stretching the limits of human possibility. Imagine surgeons in the operating room utilizing virtual reality applications and artificial intelligence to operate on your heart with greater diagnostic accuracy and precision, or dozing off on your morning ride to work in a self-driving car?

But for the investor, how do you distinguish between investing in developing brands or mature companies? Developing brands catch headlines, but will they last? Leading tech firms like Apple or Microsoft still innovate, but they also have a base of products that have become entrenched in the market, capable of providing long-term revenue stability.

Investing in the dominant technological leaders

A sector on the bleeding edge of innovation can come with some elements of volatility. Investors can navigate these sometimes choppy waters by focusing on the largest players in the space. By taking a long-term time horizon, and investing in the highest-quality tech companies, investors access the growth opportunity and innovation of the sector while focusing on the companies with scale, cash reserves, and brand recognition to stay profitable no matter the market cycle.
